THE SWITCH

space in which I can collapse into bed, and I don't notice that what we're doing is, apparently, 'artisan warehouse living'. When Martha leaves I really should talk to Fitz about the two of us moving somewhere more reasonable. Aside from the weird old cat lady next door, everyone who lives in this building seems to have a hipster beard or a start-up; I'm not sure Shoreditch is where we belong.

'You manage to speak to Yaz last night?' I ask, getting myself another glass of water.

Yaz is Martha's girlfriend, currently touring a play out in America for six months. Yaz and Martha's relationship causes me high levels of vicarious stress. Everything seems to involve incredibly complex logistics. They're always in different time zones and sending one another important documents transatlantically and making crucial life decisions on WhatsApp calls with really patchy signal. This current situation is an excellent example of their style: Yaz will be returning in eight weeks' time, taking possession of a house (which has yet to be bought) and moving her pregnant girlfriend into it before the baby is scheduled to come a few days later. I'm sweating again just thinking about it all.

'Yeah, Yaz is good,' Martha says, idly rubbing her bump. 'Talking at fourhundred miles an hour about Chekhov and baseball games. You know, Yazlike.' Her fond smile stretches as she yawns expansively. 'She's getting
